Glossary of Site Types

Abbey	An Abbey is generally a collection of stone built buildings designed for the use of a Monastic Order. They vary in date from the mid twelfth century onwards.
Altar	An Altar is generally a flat topped piece of stone upon which mass is celebrated.
Altar Tomb	An altar tomb is a chest shaped tomb designed to resemble an altar. The uppermost part of the altar tomb sometimes bears an effigy of the person interred. An inscription frequently survives.
Annexe	An annexe is an addition to an upstanding building.
Architectural Fragment	Any fragment of stone with historical value but not directly associated with the site where it was found.
Armorial Stone	An Armorial Stone is a piece of worked stone that bears the coat of arms of a particular family.
Barrow	A Barrow is a raised burial mound of earth. Barrows can belong to any Prehistoric period.
Bawn	A Bawn is simply a fortified enclosure and is normally associated with a Tower House. They date from the fifteenth century onwards.
Boundary Stone	A boundary stone is an upright stone marking the borders of an ancient territory.
Bullaun Stone	A Bullaun is the name given to a large stone with a basin-like depression on its upper surface. It is possible that they were used as fonts.
Cairn	A raised mound of stone varying in size. Cairns are generally associated with prehistoric burial.
Cashel	A Cashel is an enclosed farmstead built using dry-stone walls. They are similar in function and plan to ringforts (see below). They date to the early Medieval period.
Children's Burial Ground	These were normally used for the burials of unbaptised children and for people thought to be outside of society. They are believed to date from 1000 AD onwards.

Cist	A Cist is normally built with stone slabs. They generally contain cremated remains in a pot or crouched skeletal remains. Bronze Age in date they may also have associated grave goods.
Columbarium	A Columbarium is another term for a dovecote or pigeon house. They are sometimes associated with monasteries and are often built of stone.
Crannóg	A crannóg is an enclosure built on a natural or artificial island in a lake. They are difficult to date precisely without excavation and may have their origins in the Neolithic period.
Cross	This is a common field monument varying in form, style and purpose. They date from the early Medieval period onward.
Cross Base	A rectangular or square worked stone base for a cross.
Cross Head	Often all that remains of a Cross is the Head. Simply the uppermost part of a cross, with or without the arms and supporting central portion.
Cross Slab	Simply an upright stone slab with a cross either incised or in relief.
Cross Inscribed Stone	Similar to the Cross slab but may vary in shape.
Cultivation Ridge	A ridge of earth, which has built up as a result of ploughing or tilling.
Date Stone	A block of stone with a date carved into it.
Dwelling	An artificially built structure in which people lived. This term can be applied to buildings from any archaeological period.
Earthwork	A man made monument constructed from upcast earth. This term can therefore be applied to a wide range of features ranging from the Late Bronze Age until the late Medieval Period.
Ecclesiastical Enclosure	Specifically, an enclosed area associated with ecclesiastical structures. A monastic field enclosure for example.

Ecclesiastical Residence	This term can be applied to any structure that was inhabited by an ecclesiastic.
Enclosure	This can be applied to any area that is defined by walls, banks or ditches.
Field System	The earliest field systems in Ireland date to between 4000-2500 BC. The vast majority however belong to the seventeenth to nineteenth centuries.
Flat Cemetery	A flat area of ground used to inter two or more individuals. Cemetery can be used to define burials from any period from the prehistoric through the early Medieval period and onwards.
Font	A font is simply a receptacle (usually in a church) for holding baptismal water.
Fortified House	This term is generally applied to a fortified dwelling of the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.
Fulacht Fiadh	Fulacht Fiadhs tend to date from the mid to late Bronze Age (1500 BC to 500 BC approximately). They are one of the most common field monuments in Ireland and are believed to have been used for cooking purposes.
Gatehouse	This may be defined as a room over a gate sometimes of two stories. Surviving examples from the early Medieval (500-1000 AD) period are rare; they are more commonly associated with Medieval castles.
Gateway	A structure built over a gate or any entrance or opening for a gate.
Grave Slab	These date from the early Medieval period and are simply slabs or gravestones with inscriptions. They continue in use until the present.
Graveyard	A graveyard is on consecrated ground with defined grave markers usually enclosed by a wall or a bank and frequently associated with remains of a church.
Habitation	A house or home. This term can be used for a house or home from any archaeological period.
Hearth	This can be defined as the floor or base of a fireplace or the bottom of a blast furnace where molten metal collects

Hillfort	A banked and ditched enclosure on the summit of a hill for defensive purposes They are thought to date to the Late Bronze Age or Iron Age.
Holy Well	Holy wells were customarily visited for cures and are often associated with a local saint. The origins of their use are undateable but they were used throughout the early Medieval period and many are still in use today.
Inscribed Stone	This can describe any stone with inscribed writing. This could be Ogham inscriptions (see below) or inscriptions in any written language. They can therefore date from the Iron Age through to the Medieval and late Medieval periods.
Iron Working	The first definite traces of iron working occur in the late Iron Age (0-500 AD approx.) In the late Medieval period iron began to be produced on a large scale.
Leper Hospital	Dating to the Medieval period, these were any hospital specifically built to house people with any skin disorders. Leper Hospitals were generally run by a Monastic Order.
Linear Ditch	A ditch with any associated bank being constructed from the upcast material.
Linear Earthwork	This term can be used to define a linear earthwork from any period. It could be on the scale of a simple field boundary or a large continuous earthwork such as the Black Pigs Dyke.
Linear Feature	Any feature which appears to run along a specific line whether identified on the surface through surveying or sub-surface through geo-physics etc.
Mansion	The most basic definition of a Mansion is of a large house. The term usually describes the houses built by the landed Gentry from the late seventeenth century onward.
Megalithic Structure	Any structure built using large stones. It generally refers to the tombs of the Neolithic period (4000 –2000 BC approx.).
